Implications for Architects - is development assessment really planning?

Dr Michael Llewellyn-Smith

Area Councillor, Adelaide City Council; Visiting Scholar, The Martin Centre, University of Cambridge

Strategic planning and development assessment are two distinctive but complementary processes of the planning system. The role of elected politicians in both is examined. The community should be engaged at the front end of the planning process but the assessment of applications should be objective, professional and technical - not political. The system of planning and development control in South Australia is used as a background for the arguments.
